Physical Description

This large, prepossessing house entirely dominates its small lot and the suburban residential block on which it is located. The two-story, frame Dutch Colonial-style house, designed by Charles Thompson in 1911, features a dramatic gambrel gable end roof which extends halfway down the front of the house, broken only by two long shed-roofed dormer windows. These dormers flank an equally dramatic central cross gable with gambrel roof which extends over the front porch and dominates the principal facade. This dormer is faced with wide weatherboards, like the body of the house, and embellished at the top with half-timber effects and three diamond paned windows. Augmenting the picturesque effect is a large granite chimney rising just to the side of this front gable. Granite is also used for the large piers which support the front gable and for the low porch walls. The handsome porte-cochere located at the southeast end of the porch is in the form of a pergola supported by fluted Doric-like columns. Windows, including those of the front door and sidelight, are all multi-paned.

Statement of Significance

The Reid House at 1425 Kavanaugh in Little Rock was designed by Charles L. Thompson in 1911. Located in the picturesque Pulaski Heights area of town, this house is the largest, most dramatic interpretation of the Dutch Colonial style in the firm's collection. The house features a dramatic gambrel gable end roof which extends halfway down the front of the house. Two dormers flank a central cross gable on the facade of the house. The Dutch Colonial Reid House is an important part of the streetscape in one of Little Rock's oldest suburban areas, dominating the entire block.
